Human: What's the song Every Breath You Take by the Police about?

Assistant: "Every Breath You Take" by The Police is about obsessive surveillance and possessive love, though it's often misunderstood as a romantic ballad. The song depicts someone who is watching their former partner's every move after a breakup, monitoring everything they do with an unsettling intensity.

Sting, who wrote the song, has described it as sinister and about surveillance rather than romance. The lyrics "Every breath you take, every move you make, I'll be watching you" reveal the narrator's controlling and stalking behavior toward someone who has left them. Lines like "Since you've gone I've been lost without a trace" and "I feel so cold and I long for your embrace" show the narrator's desperation and inability to let go.

The song's dark themes are somewhat masked by its melodic, gentle musical arrangement, which contributes to why many people initially hear it as a love song. However, it's actually more of a commentary on unhealthy obsession and the inability to accept the end of a relationship. Sting has noted that he finds it disturbing when the song is played at weddings, given its actual meaning about possessive stalking behavior.

The track became one of The Police's biggest hits and is often cited as one of the most misunderstood songs in popular music due to the contrast between its pleasant melody and its unsettling lyrical content.
